Sir,

Could you not investigate the possibility of members attending the House of Commons that would then require them to 'overnight' in their second homes in London, to stay instead in a 'hotel'. I mean that would it not be feasible to purchase an establishment that would be secure, have the requisite communications and accommodation so that there would no longer be the need for any MP to have a second home, and therefore the whole issue of expenses claims would not arise! The need for numerous security 'drive by's' or even guards on some member's houses would also be negated. It would stop the furore over expenses in it's tracks!
